The street plano is the natural successor to the old barrel organ and the little German band. It is mechanically a combination of the music box and the ordinary plano. It owes its legitimate rise to its capacity for embellishing the popular song of the day and then carrying it within hearing distance of the homes of all sorts and conditions of men, women and children. The blain tune suris the masses, the embellishment pieces the classes. Unlike the street organ, its repertoric is always up to date. This is another reason for its popularity. Filling its several offices so nearly it could no longer escape the eye of at lenst one species of the great American advertiser and now since it is used by him as a legitimate medium it has become a great moral force, making fortunes for several classes of persons besides the man who operates it.
